The Royal Canadian Shows

Will appear at Napanee Fair Aug. 21, 22, 23, 24

Special Free Acts

in front of the Grand Stand Each Day.

Harry Lottridge's premier attraction, known as the Royal Canadian Shows, is coming here to present a programme of real entertainment.

For many years Harry and his company have been touring Ontario, and his shows have grown more popular each year. His visit is now looked forward to as one of the events of the season. Thousands of people flock into town from the countryside to enjoy a few hours of fun and frolic on the Fair Grounds when the show comes to town.

This show has grown considerably since it first appeared here. By furnishing good, clean amusement and living up to every word in their advertisements, the Royal Canadian Shows have earned a reputation second to none. Wherever they go they find excellent patronage, and the support of the public has enabled them to enlarge their show until now they have a carnival which has no equal in the Province to-day they travel in their own special ten-car train. A show that requires ten large railway coaches to accommodate its staff and equipment is, in the parlance of the street, "some show."

This show, which is under the personal supervision of Harry Lottridge, is coming here after a most successful run in Hamilton, Sarnia, Windsor, Peterborough, Brockville and other Provincial towns and cities "I want the public to know that we have spared no effort in our attempt to make the Royal Canadian Shows the best in Canada," Mr. Lottridge stated during a recent interview. "We may not have the biggest, but I am confident we have the best and cleanest organization playing the Dominion," he continued. "We are bringing three new rides, shows of the highest class and a number of new concessions. It is a pleasure for me to be able to assure the people of Napanee that every member of our organization is either personally known to me or comes to us bearing unquestionable recommendations. I have personally revised each show before opening and offer them to the public with a feeling of confidence, for I know them to be shows of merit and absolutely clean. We extend a special invitation to the women and children to visit us. Our employees are acquainted with our policy of courtesy and respectful treatment, and have been instructed accordingly. We will not tolerate discourtesy."

The Royal Canadian Shows following the completion of their engagement here, will begin an eleven weeks' tour of Ontario fairs. Fair managers all over Ontario have been anxious to secure their premier attraction as a part of their annual program, for they realize how popular Harry Lottridge's show is among the people.

Let now a word as to what you may expect to see when you visit this big show The brilliant music of the calliphone attracts hundreds of people to the central field. The crescent-shaped arrangement of banners, tents, electric lights, noise makers and all the rest of the paraphernalia that goes to make up a good, clean show are laid out in panorama. The merry-go-round, the whip and the Ferris Wheel provide two hours of solid enjoyment. Boys and girls will receive a thrill of keen delight in Prof. Crocker's exceptionally entertaining pony show. The educated equines do their work unusually well and seem to understand every word spoken to them by their trainer. "June," the five-years-old pony, will be loved by all youngsters. Prof. Lockman's "Temple of Wonders" will be an unending source of pleasure and profit to both old and young. He lectures on the snakes, lizards, armadillo, octopus and other denizens of land and sea.

Another of the attractions is Carl, the Egyptian Seer, who foretells the future. He is well-known in Ontario, where he has made many friends on previous visits Arrayed in the flowing gown of the East, he is a picturesque figure as he sits in his special tent near the office headquarters. He possesses an uncanny insight into the future, and has made many a young couple happy fortelling pleasant things that come to pass. Both old and young find his service very entertaining and often very helpful. While at Prescott last year he was able to locate the place where searchers could find the body of a man recently drowned in the St. Lawrence river The long lines of attractive concessions will buzz with activity. The games are fair and square, and valuable prizes are to be won by the daring. An efficient corps of attendants will look after the wants of customers with promptness and courtesy.

Harry Lottridge and his shows are no strangers to this part of the Province. These shows have expanded remarkably in the last year or so, and he anticipates even greater strides. The show will run every afternoon and evening during the fair.

George Papas, who has been with the company for many years, has charge of the drink and food concessions, and also the work of catering to the big staff of employees. He has shown unusual capacity for this duty, and his courtesy to the public, as well as his knack of knowing just what they want, has made him a popular figure wherever the show has located.

The show in front of the Grand Stand at the Fair will be one of the features. Something that shown at the usual fall exhibitions in the past. The Royal Canadian Shows, which will produce this part of the show is free to all occupants of seats in the Grand Stand during the afternoon, and includes the following acts :

The selvys, in versville stunts, flying rings, trapeze and acrobatic work, hand balancing, etc.

Gaylor, the giant frog and contortionist will give an exhibition that will amaze you.

Fred Guthrie, aerial and ground acts that are startling and original.

Crocker's ponies The most intelligent of performing animals. These intelligent animals are entertaining and are considered the feature act of the performance in front of the Grand Stand.

THE END MAKES ALL CARS EQUAL

BY ERWIN GREER

Is there an automobile 'heaven'—a place where cars may repose the personality of the 'worn-outs' for which through the years many or few has served one or perhaps several masters faithfully?

One wonders this and ponders that as he gazes where at last earthly remnants of innumerable odds and ends which once were automobiles rot or decay or wait to be carried away.

If you don't believe an automobile has a personality, visit the "auto graveyard" and see for yourself.

This is the dissembling yard —the place where the car that is to be dismantled and wrecked goes through its first operation. An average ten cars a day is taken down here. The car is rolled on to a steel rack and after a surprisingly few minutes' work the entire body is lifted off the chassis with a crane and swung across to a platform. The master wrecker determines just what parts are to be taken out whole and what parts are to be mutilated.

If the engine has been found to be in unusually good condition, it is taken out and left intact. The various units such as the transmission, universal joints and rear axle are separated and set aside for examination by an expert, who quickly determines whether they are too badly worn for any further service.

Where a part is found to be badly, worn or broken, it is promptly consigned to the scrap pile.

In the event that the motor is to be dismantled and not preserved for resale intact, it is, contrary to the prevalent opinion not smashed but carefully placed upon a motor stand and taken down piece by piece.

I wish that some automobile owners could stand around and witness the silent lecture that is unfolded, as some of these motors come down. The words abuse and carelessness would take on a new meaning to the motorists who could see a sturdy masterpiece in bronze and aluminum and iron that was hurried to an untimely end by the owner's heedlessness of its many warnings of impending trouble in its vitals.

Yes, many lessons may be learned from a visit to the automobile graveyard.

MOST people know this absolute antidote for pain, but are you careful to say Bayer when you buy it? And do you always give a glance to see Bayer on the box—and the word genuine printed in red? It isn't the genuine Aspirin without it! A drug-store always has Bayer, with the proven directions tucked in every box:

Aspirin is the trade mark (registered in Canada) of Bayer Manufacture. While it is well known that Aspirin means Bayer manufacture, to protect the public against imitations, the Tablets will be stamped with their "Bayer Cross" trade mark.

TEA SEVEN TIMES A DAY.

Fact Gleaned Under the Exchange of Teachers Plan.

There were more valuable facts gleaned, but none more interesting than that in New Zealand "they" drink tea seven times a day!

This was told by Miss Luella Derbecker, of IKtchener, who had spent a year in the Antipodes, under the Teachers' Exchange.

"The land of the long, white cloud." Thus Miss Derbecker described New Zealand a country where the stranger in the gates was accorded every opportunity of seeing its beauties and its wonders. Snow and ice were almost unknown to the school children. One of her young pupils had retailed the information to his elders in an altered form, that "in Canada people could walk on the water!"

Miss Derbecker stated that although there were no furnaces in the houses, the practice of tea-drinking served to counteract the chill of the rainy season during July and August.

Tea before breakfast, tea at breakfast, morning tea at half-past ten, tea for lunch, afternoon tea, tea for dinner and tea for supper, was the unvarying procedure. Even the schools, shops and offices served morning tea at 10.30, she said.

There was a broad outlook on international affairs in the island, due largely to the knowledge gained through the many ships that touched its coasts from other countries. The railroads were Government-owned, the system of education was admirable, the people were contented, and altogether New Zealand was the ideal of place one wished to visit all over again.

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON

BY G. C. TRUMBULL,
(Editor of The Sunday School Times.)

PAUL CARRIES THE GOSPEL INTO EUROPE.

Golden Text—Come over into Macedonia and help us.—Acts 16:9.

The first missionaries did not believe in merely evangelizing and then leaving the new converts to themselves. Paul said to Barnabas, "Let us go again and visit our brethren in every city where we have preached the word of the Lord, and see how they do." What the Scriptures call "babes in Christ" must be fed and built up on the word of God.

Now comes a severe controversy between Paul and Barnabas over the question of taking with them again John Mark, who had turned back from the first missionary journey and had failed the older men (Acts 13:13). Paul thought it not wise to take him with them now, but Barnabas was determined to do so. So the missionaries separated and went in different directions, Barnabas taking Mark and Paul taking Silas. The Scofield Reference Bible comments significantly that Barnabas is heard of no more in the Bible story.

Passing through Syria and Cilicia, on the northwest of the Mediterranean Sea, Paul comes to Derbe and Lystra and recruits another young man, Timothy, who was to become prominent in the early history of the Church and was the recipient of two of Paul's inspired Epistles.

As Paul and Silas and Timothy went on in this second missionary journey, they delivered to the churches the decrees that had been officially given by the Council at Jerusalem, which we studied last week. Salvation was by grace alone, and, believing this, "so were the churches established in the faith, and increased in number daily" Perhaps churches would increase more effectively and steadily today if the gospel of sheer grace were preached more faithfully, and not any form of salvation by works.

Are there times and places where God Himself may forbid us to preach His Word? Our first impulse might be to think that surely the proclaiming of the Word of God is fitting, and has to be blessed, at all times and in all places. But the Scriptures do not say so; they plainly say otherwise. For after this missionary party had gone through Phrygia and the region of Galatia, going well to the west of Asia Minor, they naturally expected to go on preaching the Word of God in the Province in which they found themselves, then called Asia. But they "were forbidden of the Holy Ghost to preach the Word in Asia." So they passed on to Mysia and made their plains to go north into Bithynia, on the southern coast of the Euxine or Black Sea. Another surprise, for here the Spirit suffered them not.

Why did the Holy Spirit, who had commissioned Paul and the missionaries' work, and who was plainly guiding these missionaries, forbid them to carry the good news of salvation into the Provinces of Asia and Bithynia? The Scriptures do not tell us why, and therefore, we cannot know. But there is a striking evidence that God has definite plans for the evangelization of certain countries at certain times. His work is not indiscriminate and promiscious; if it is done as God directs, it is sure to have blessed results; if it is not done under His guidance, it may be useless or worse. He promises that His Word shall not return unto Him void, but shall prosper in the thing whereunto He sends it (Isa. 55:11). But if He does not send it we have no right to expect it to prosper.

As the missionaries yielded to the Holy Spirit's guidance they passed by Mysia and came down to the coast at Troas. Here Paul had his vision by night, as a man of Macedonia stood by him with the pleading call, "Come over into Macedonia and help us." Dreams and visions may not always be from God, but we may always know whether they are or not if we seek God's wisdom concerning them, and if we are ready for His leading at any cost. Paul was assured that the Lord was calling his party to preach the Gospel in Europe; they sailed from Troas straight to Samothracia, and then on to Neapolis and Philippi, having crossed the Aegean Sea.

As always, when He leads us in any given direction, God had gone ahead and prepared the way in advance. At Philippi there was a group of devout women who worshipped God and met together regularly for prayer. Paul's missionary party found its way on a Sabbath Day to this place of meeting, just outside the city by a river side.

A business woman named Lydia, who was a dealer in fine purple, and whose heart the Lord opened, listened eagerly to the good news proclaimed by Paul. She believed in the One of whom Paul spoke, Jesus of Nazareth, the only Saviour of men. She and her husband were baptized, and she asked the group of missionaries, if they judged her to be faithful to the Lord, to come to her house and abide there. Gladly they accepted this Christian fellowship and hospitality. It was the beginning of the evangelization of Europe and of the Gospel opportunities that have come down through the centuries to us.

It is interesting to note that up to this point in the Book of Acts the personal pronoun "they" has been used. In Verse 10, however, the word "they" is changed to "we"; the text reads: "After he had seen the vision, immediately we endeavored to go into Macedonia, assuredly gathering that the Lord had called for us to preach the Gospel unto them." It is believed that this change in pronoun indicates that Luke, the author of the Book of Acts, joined Paul's company at Troas.

THE AZTECS.

Are of Semitic Descent, Not Mongolian, Says Professor.

That Mexican aborigine races are not of Mongolian descent, but Hebraic, is the contention of Dr. Maximus Neumayer, an Austrian theosophist, who claims that the missing Israelitish tribes came to America and settled in the former Aztec empire.

Prof. Neumayer wrested the secrets of ancient civilization in Mexico from idols and other Aztec relics in the National Museum, Mexico City, as well as from the famous Teotihuacan pyramids and the recently discovered tower at Cuicuilco, on the slopes of the Ajusco mountain in the federal district, is said to date back to the twelfth century B.C.

"The attitude of the idols, the Aztec calendar, Phoenician and Hebraic letters clearly identified on some stone monuments, a swastika discovered on an ancient Aztec vase, together with the architecture of the Teotihuacan pyramids," says Prof. Neumayer, "lead but to one conclusion: The aborigine races in Mexico are of Semitic descent."

HIGH PRICES ARE OFTEN IMAGINARY

(By Betty Barclay)

The average woman fails to appreciate the fact that many foods looked upon at certain seasons as expensive, are really reasonable in price and sometimes actually cheap.

Price is only relative, and we should remember this when we are marketing. If we don't, we are likely to fly off on a tangent and come home without some of the things we need, bringing in their place certain foods that we are at present eating too freely.

Let us take oranges and the present time to prove our point. This fruit is selling today at a price that many women look upon as rather high. Probably here and there a woman is buying in smaller quantities or not at all, waiting for the price to come down to last year's level. Is she acting wisely or even intelligently when she takes this stand?

Five cents for an orange may appear high to the woman who purchased oranges last year for thirty or forty cents a dozen. But how about figuring upon size before deciding that the price is too high. We do not hesitate to pay five cents for a very small portion of butter, beefsteak or walnut meat—and we are so accustomed to paying from sixty cents to a dollar a pound for such foods that we hardly think of the price. Place an orange beside five cents' worth of porterhouse steak, or five cents' worth of many other staples, and we will see that even at sixty cents a dozen, oranges are not particularly high.

Or figure this so-called high price of ours by the pound. Oranges selling at sixty cents a dozen, probably average about three to the pound—bringing our price per pound down to fifteen cents.

This is interesting, isn't it? Here we have paid sixty cents a pound for butter when it was not particularly plentiful, every year since we first started to market—and we rarely complain-and. We pay forty, fifty, sixty, or even seventy cents a pound for meat—and still we keep comparatively quiet. But when we are paying fifteen cents a pound for oranges we begin to shout "expensive."

Price is merely relative. Instead of paying a high price for oranges today, we are really paying a price that is a little higher than a very cheap price paid for the crop was much heavier and the demand not so great.

No! There is no argument by bringing up the fact that sixty cent meat is natural because it comes from the middle west and it takes a steer a long time to get from a calf to beefdom. Your breakfast orange probably comes from California, from a tree that has been growing for years before the steer's mother was born.

We merely get into a rut by comparing prices when they are high with prices when they are low, and not realizing that climate, crop, rainfall, packing, and a dozen and one other things enter into the high price that may prevail at a certain time.

To a great extent we should forget price and think more of health. The minute we do this we will be able to save enough on foods that we are now eating too heavily to purchase all we need of he foods that we should eat more than we now do.

Most of us eat too heavily of carbohydrate and protein foods that have an acid reaction in the body, and not nearly enough of fresh fruits and green vegetables—particularly the leaf vegetable. See to it therefore that expensive carbohydrates and proteins are purchased in less quantity—and with the money saved you can purchase more liberally of the desirable balancing foods, even though they may be selling at a little higher figure than they were a month or a year ago.

See to it that you eat heavily of green vegetables and fresh fruits of all kinds. Drink milk if you like it. Drink lemonade when thirsty and help to reduce the acidity of your body—for strange as it may seem, lemons, like oranges, have a decided alkaline effect when taken into the system. Drink plenty of pure, cold water. Eat salads, cups, light desserts. Sleep. Exercise.

Do these things and you need not worry about the high price of foods, even though you are really eating more than you purchase. Gradually you will save enough on other things to continue your use of some of the foods high in price, your health If you don't, you'll surely save more than enough by the elimination of doctor's bills.

You are expensive when you do not get enough of it, or when you eat it too heavily. Don't worry overmuch about the price you pay. One food, low in price, may be very expensive if it causes internal trouble. Expensive onions are cheap if they counteract the acidity of the body and bring relief. Price is only relative and women should remember this when they shop.

CYPRUS HISTORY BY STAMP.

Telling How British Occupy First Christian Ruled Country.

The Government of Cyprus, the first country in the world to be ruled by a Christian governor, the Roman Sergius Paulus, who was converted by Paul and Barnabas, has issued a set of postage stamps in commemoration of the fiftieth anniversary of the British occupation of the island by virtue of the convention with Turkey of 1878.

Ten denominations represent persons, objects and incidents of interest in a history proverbially rich in traditional associations, among the subjects selected being Zeno, founder of the Stoic philosophy, Mount Olympus, Aphrodite rising from the waves at Paphos, Richard Coeur de Lion and Umm Haram, nurse of the prophet Mohammed. This special issue is for twelve months only, after which any stocks will be destroyed and the present series resumed.

THE IMPORTANCE OF EARLY FALL PLOUGHING

(Experimental Farms Note.)

In a new country such as northern Ontario, it is imperative that seeding be done early in the spring to ensure good maturity, and unless a part of the necessary work in the preparation of a good seed-bed is started early in the fall, there is always danger of some of the work being left for the next spring.

The first step necessary is, naturally, that of ploughing and this operation should, whenever possible, be done in late summer as soon as possible after the hay is cut.

At the Dominion Experimental Station, Kapuskasing, it has been found that land which has been ploughed early in the fall and given one or two diskings works much better in the spring, with a finer and more friable seed-bed, and gives better yields than land ploughed late in the fall or in the spring, particularly in the latter. Weather conditions, such as wetting and drying, freezing and thawing, etc., appear to have a very beneficial effect on the physical condition of heavy clay-soil. It was found that land ploughed early and receiving one or two diskings in the fall gives 15 per cent. more yield.

Considering the advantages of fall ploughing it is imperative that the farmer take advantage of every opportunity during the late summer and autumn in order to complete this important feature of the work before the ground freezes and winter sets in.

JOBIN, THE WOOD-CARVER

French-Canadian Spent Half a Century Carving Life-Like Human Figures.

On the picturesque highway between Montreal and Quebec, the motorist is constantly passing the wayside shrine, symbolic of the deeply religious faith of the habitant, writes Jean Ritchie Anderson in the Montreal Weekly Star and Family Herald. The same spirit pervades the roadside Stations of the Cross, as on Mounts the hill with the pilgrims at Sainte Anne de Beaupre, perhaps the most famous shrine on the American continent. In another part of Sainte Anne de Beaupre, standing the wayside shrine, symbolic of the deeply religious faith of the habitant, writes Jean Ritchie Anderson in the Montreal Weekly Star and Family Herald. The same spirit pervades the roadside Stations of the Cross, as on Mounts the hill with the pilgrims at Sainte Anne de Beaupre, perhaps the most famous shrine on the American continent. In another part of Sainte Anne de Beaupre, standing the most famous shrine on the American continent. In another part of Sainte Anne de Beaupre, standing the wood-carver, Louis Jobin, who for more than half a century plied his trade, with chisel and mallet, hammering and carving the rough logs into life-like human figures. This most famous of French-Canadian wood-carvers died in 1924 and it is with a feeling of admiration and respect that one learns of his life and the work he accomplished.

Jobin was born in St. Raymond, Que., although he spent most of his childhood at Point aux Trembles, not far from Quebec. As a boy he loved to whittle the soft pine into all sorts of toys. In his early teens he was bound as an apprentice for three years to Francis Xavier Berringeret. This was a time when there were a great many wooden ships and Jobin's first real work was on figure-heads in the forms of dolphins, sirens and Neptunes.

A notable Jobin figure in Quebec is a statue of Gen. Wolfe which occupies a niche in the Canadian Pacific ticket office.

After his apprenticeship was out and Jobin had settled permanently in the vicinity of the ancient Capital, Jobin went to New York, where he worked for John Bolton of St. John street, Battery Place. Then for five or six years he was in Montreal where he became known as the originator of the cigar-store Indian, a once useful and fancy article now a extinct art figure heads for wooden ships.

But the most enduring part of Louis Jobin's work was done in his modest little shop at Sainte Anne de Beaupre where he spent his days modelling religious figures. The walls of the building were hung with bits of his work—an angel's wing, a crown, or a trumpet—and on the floor was a stove, a carpenter's bench, and the stump on which he was at work. As he grew older, Jobin's kind and loveable nature fitted him particularly for the modelling of the sad figure of Our Saviour on the Cross, and he became famous for his Calvaries. Of the roadside shrines which he executed those at Beaumont, Lauzon, Pintendre are considered among the most realistic. A farmer at the last-named place paid one hundred dollars for his statue but he bought it at a time when there was a continuous output from the little shop at Sainte Anne de Beaupre. Now that the artistic old wood-carver has finished his lifegenuine Jobins will sell at a premium.

For the Roman Catholic Church at St. Roch, Jobin executed many religious figures. Seventeen can be seen to-day in the church at Rivière du Loup, and there are three notable ones at St. Pyrre, well as many others. Though Jobin, accomplished so much work, his models do not look like the product of a machine for every piece, carefully modelled by his own hands has an individuality all its own. The priest at the famous shrine at Sainte Anne used to put the finishing touch to each figure before it was sent out into the world, when he sprinkled it with holy water and gave it his blessing.

On the cruise up the Saguenay the visitor is struck with the beauty of a statue of the Blessed Virgin towering over the world-famous cliff, Cape Trinity. This is Jobin's work. The figure is twenty-five feet high and the head of the Virgin is surmounted with twelve stars. It was made in 1880 and was erected as a thank offering to God on behalf of a traveller who, by some mysterious way escaped death when his carriage fell over a precipice.

Though Jobin was eighty-six when he died it was only very recently that owing to failing eyesight, he was forced to give up his work. Edouard Marcotte, his nephew, whom he trained in the art, continues the work of the humble artist who for over sixty years plied his artiste trade in the little town of Sainte Anne de Beaupre.

THE REVOLVER

Should Be Simply and Properly Forbidden to Civilians.

Many things have happened recently, are happening now, that bring gravely into question the wisdom of our present Firearms Act, says the London Daily Express.

As they are now, nearly any one can obtain an official license from the police to have firearms in his possession. The forms that have to be filled in and the references furnished are a formality that is little less than a farce.

They work almost as automatically as the pistol which is their usual result. The only useful purpose they serve is by creating the presumption that any one discovered with an unlicensed revolver or automatic pistol has obtained it for some sinister scheme of his own. But the line thus drawn between the legal and the illegal ownership of these deadly weapons is of little practical moment.

The bare truth is that the man who prefers a license can be virtually sure of getting it, while the man who does not bother himself about these official ceremonies gets the revolver instead, just as easily. What the authorities should do is to ask themselves why anybody, or at least any civilian, should be permitted to own and carry these relics of an age when all life was insecure, and each man's protection depended on himself.

The object of having a revolver can only be to injure other people or kill them. The east with which revolvers can be procured and used is a constant temptation to the criminal and the mentally deranged. They are weapons of attack, and have little or no use either for protection or for sport.

In war they play a useful and necessary part, but so do a multitude of other inventions that nobody would be mad enough to allow civilians to own and employ. We do not issue licenses for the possession of bombs or bags of poison gas. Such lethal instruments are simply and properly forbidden to civilians. So it should be with revolvers and automatic pistols.

When Better Automobiles Are Built—McLaughlin-Buick Will Build Them

AIKENSIDE

BY MARY J. HOLMES

Author of "Dora Deane," "The English Orphans," "Lena Rivers," "The Rector of St. Mark's," "Tempest and Sunshine," Etc.

"I do not know, grandpa. I hope I may do right. I think I shall keep Uncle Joseph with me," Maddy replied, a shudder creeping over her as she thought of living out all her youth and possibly middle age with a lunatic.

But her grandfather's whispered blessings brought comfort with them, and a calm quiet fell upon her as she sat there listening to the words of prayer, and catching now and then her own name and that of Guy's.

"I am drowsy, Maddy. Watch while I sleep. Perhaps I'll never wake again," grandpa said, and clasping Maddy's hands he fell away to sleep, while Maddy kept her watch beside him, herself falling into a troubled sleep, from which she was aroused by a clammy hand pressing on her forehead, and Uncle Joseph's voice, which said: "Wake, my child. There's been a guest here while you slumbered," and he pointed to the rigid features of the newly dead.

CHAPTER XX.

Of the days which followed, Maddy had no distinct consciousness. She only knew that other hands than hers cared for the dead, that in the little parlor a stiff, white figure lay, that neighboring women stole in, treading on tiptoe, and speaking in hushed voices as they consulted, not her, but Mrs. Noah, who had come at once, and cared for her and hers so kindly. That she lay all day in her own room, where the summer breeze blew softly through the window, bringing the perfume of summer flowers, the sound of a tolling bell, of grinding wheel, the notes of a low, sad hymn, sung in faltering tones and of many feet moving from the door. Then friendly faces looked in upon her, asking how she felt, and whispering ominously to each other as she answered:

"Very well; is grandpa getting better?"

Then Mrs. Noah sat with her for a time, fanning her with a palm-leaf fan and brushing the flies away. Then Flora came up with a man whom they called "Doctor," and who gave her sundry little pills and powders dissolved in water, after which they all went out and left her there with Jessie, who had been crying, and whose soft little hands felt so cool on her hot head, and whose kisses on her lips made the tears start, and brought a thought of Guy, making her ask, "If he was at the funeral."

"No," Jessie said; mother wanted to write and tell him, but we don't know where he is."

And this was all Maddy could recall of the days succeeding the night of her last watch at her grandfather's side, until one balmy August afternoon, when on the Honedale hills there lay that smoky haze so like the autumn time hurrying on space, and when through her open window stole the fragrance of the later summer flowers. Then, as if waking from an ordinary sleep, she woke suddenly to consciousness, and staring about the room, wondered if it were as late as the western sun would indicate, and how she came to sleep so long. For a while she lay thinking, and as she thought, a sad scene came back to her, a night when her hot hands had been enfolded in those of the dead, and that dead her grandfather. Was it true, or was she laboring under some hallucination of the brain? If true, was that white, placid face still to be seen in the room below, or had they buried him from her sight? She would know, and with a strange kind of nervous strength she arose, and throwing on the wrapper and slippers which lay near, descended the stairs, wondering to find herself so weak and half shuddering at the deep stillness of the house; stillness broken only by the ticking of the clock and the purring of the house cat, which at sight of Maddy arose from its position near the door and came forward, rubbing its sides against her dress, and trying in various ways to evince its joy at seeing one whose caresses it had missed so long. The little bedroom off the kitchen where grandpa slept and died was vacant; the old-fashioned coat was put away, as was every vestige of the old man save the broad-rimmed hat, which hung upon the wall just where his hands had hung it, and which looked so much like its owner that with a gush of tears Maddy sank upon the bed, moaning to herself, "Yes, grandpa is dead. I remember now. But Uncle Joseph, where is he? Can he, too, have died without my knowledge?" and she looked around in vain for the lunatic, not a trace of whom was to be found. His room was in perfect order, as was everything about the house, showing that Flora was still the domestic goddess, while Maddy also detected various things which she recognized as having come from Aikenside. Who sent them? Did Guy, and had he been there, too, while she was sick? The thought brought a throb of joy to Maddy's heart, but it soon passed away as she began again to wonder if Uncle Joseph, too, had died, and where Flora was. It was not far to the Honedale burying ground, Maddy could see the headstones from where she sat gleaming through the August sunlight; could discern her mother's, and knew that two fresh mounds at least were made beside it. But were there three Was Uncle Joseph there? By stealing across the meadow in the rear of the house the distance to the graveyard was shortened more than half, and could not be more than the eighth part of a mile. She could walk so far, she knew. The fresh air would do her good, and hunting up her long unused hat, the impatient girl started, stopping once or twice to rest as a dizzy faintness came over her, and then continuing on until the spot she sought was reached. Three graves, one old and sunken, one made when the last winter's snow was on the hills, the other fresh and new. That was all; Uncle Joseph was not there, and vague terror entered Maddy's heart lest he had been taken back to the asylum.

"I will get him out," she said; "I will take care of him. I should die with nothing to do; and I promised grandpa——"

She could get no farther, for the rush of memories which came over her, and seating herself upon the ground close to the new grave, she laid her face upon it, and sobbed piteously:

"Oh, grandpa, I'm so lonely without you all; I almost wish I was lying here in the quiet yard."

Then a storm of tears ensued, after which Maddy grew calm, and with her head still bent down, did not hear the rapid step approaching, the manly step coming down the grassy road, coming past the moss headstones, on to where that wasted figure was crouching upon the ground. There it stopped, and in a half-whisper called, "Maddy! Maddy!"

Then, indeed, she started, and lifting up her head saw before her Guy Remington. For a moment she regarded him intently, while he said to her, oh, so kindly, so pityingly:

"Poor child, you have suffered so much, and I never knew of it till a few days ago."

Maddy stretched her hands toward him, moaning out:

"Oh, Guy, Guy, where have you been, when I wanted you so much?"

Maddy did not know what she was saying, or half comprehend the effect it had on Guy, who forgot everything save that she wanted him, had missed him, had turned to him in her trouble, and it was not in his nature to resist her appeal. With a spring he was at her side, and lifting her in his arms seated himself upon her mother's grave; then straining her tightly to his bosom, he kissed her again and again. Hot burning, passionate kisses they were, which took from Maddy all the power of resistance, even had she wished it, which she did not. Too weak to reason or see the harm, if harm there were, in being loved by Guy, she abandoned herself for a brief interval to the bliss of knowing that she was beloved, and of hearing him tell her so.

"Darling Maddy," he said, "I went away because you sent me, but now I have come back, and nothing shall part us again. You are mine; I claim you here at your mother's grave. Precious Maddy, I did not know of all this till three days ago, when Agnes' letter found me almost at the Rocky Mountains. I wish I had come before, now that I know you wanted me. Say that again, Maddy. Tell me that you missed me."

He was smoothing her hair now, as her head still lay pillowed upon his breast, so he could not see the spasm of pain which contorted her features as he thus appealed to her. Half bewildered, Maddy could not at first make out whether it were a blissful dream or a reality, her lying there in Guy's arms with his kisses on her forehead, lips, and cheeks, his words of devotion in her ear, and the soft summer sky smiling down upon her. Alas, it was a dream from which she was awakened by the thought of one across the sea, whose place she had usurped, and this it was which brought the grieved expression to her face as she answered mournfully:

"I did want you, Guy, when I forgot; but now—oh, Guy—Lucy Atherstone!"

With a gesture of impatience Guy was about to answer, when something in the heavy fall of the little hand from his shoulder alarmed him, and lifting up the drooping head he saw that Maddy had fainted. Then back across the meadow Guy bore her to the cottage, where Flora, just returned from a neighbor's, whither she had gone upon an errand, was looking for her in much affright.

Up again into her little chamber Maddy was carried and laid upon the bed, which she never left until the golden harvest sheaves were gathered in, and the hot September sun was ripening the fruits of autumn. But now she had a new nurse, a constant attendant, who during the day seldom left her except to talk with and amuse Uncle Joseph, mourning below because no one sang to him or noticed him as Maddy used to do. He had not been sent to the asylum, as Maddy feared, but by way of relieving Flora had been taken to Farmer Green's, where he was so homesick and discontented that at Guy's instigation he was suffered to return to the cottage, crying like a little child when the old familiar spot was reached, kissing his armchair, the cook-stove, the tongs, Mrs. Noah, and Flora, and timidly offering to kiss the Lord Governor himself as he persisted in calling Guy, who declined the honor but listened quietly to the crazy man's promise "not to spit the smallest kind of spit on the floor, or anywhere, except in its proper place."

Guy had passed through several states of mind during the interval in which we have seen so little of him. Furious at one time, and reckless as to consequence, he had determined to break with Lucy and marry Maddy, in spite of everybody; then, as a sense of honor came over him, he resolved to forget Maddy, if possible, and marry Lucy at once. It was in this last mood, and while roaming over the Western country whither after his banishment he had gone, that he wrote to Lucy a strange kind of letter, saying he had waited for her long enough, and, sick or well, he should claim her the coming autumn. To this letter Lucy had responded quickly, sweetly reproving Guy for his impatience, softly hinting that latterly he had been quite as culpable as herself in the matter of deferring their union and appointing the bridal day for the —— of December. After this was settled Guy felt better, though the old sore spot in his heart, or there Maddy Clyde had been, was very sore still, and sometimes it required all his powers of self-control to keep from writing to Lucy and asking to be released from an engagement so irksome as his had become. Neglecting to answer Agnes' letters when he first left home, she did not know where he was until a short time before, when she wrote apprising him of grandpa's death and Maddy's severe illness. This brought him, while Maddy's involuntary outburst when she met him in the graveyard, changed the whole current of his intentions. Let what would come, Maddy Clyde should be his wife, and as such he watched over her, nursing her back to life, and by his manner effectually silencing all remark, so that the neighbors whispered among themselves what Maddy's prospects were, and, as was quite natural, were a little more attentive to the future lady of Aikenside. Poor Maddy! it was a terrible trial which awaited her, but it must be met, and with all fears and fore-bodings she fortified herself to meet it, while Guy, the devoted lover, hung over her, never guessing of all that was passing in her mind, or how, when he was out of sight, the lips he had longed so much to kiss, but never had since that day in the graveyard, quivered with anguish as they asked for strength to do right. Oh, how Maddy did love the man she must give up, and how often went up the wailing cry, "Help me, Father, to do my duty, and give me, too, a greater inclination to do it than I now possess."

Maddy's heart did fail her sometimes and she might have yielded to the temptation but for Lucy's letter, full of eager anticipations of the happy time when she and Guy should never part again.

"Sometimes," she wrote, "there comes over me a dark foreboding of evil—a fear that I shall miss the cup now within my reach; but I pray the bad feelings away. I am sure there is no living being who will come between us to break my heart, and as I know God doeth all things well, I trust Him wholly, and cease to doubt."

It was well the letter came when it did, as it helped Maddy to meet the hour she so much dreaded, and which came at last on an afternoon when Mrs. Noah had gone to Aikenside, and Flora had gone on an errand to a neighbor's, two miles away, thus leaving Guy free to tell the story, the old, old story, yet always new to him who tells it and her who listens—story which, as Guy told it, sitting by Maddy's side, with her hands in his, thrilled her through and through, making the sweet drops start out around her lips and underneath her hair—story which made Guy himself pant nervously and tremble like a leaf, so earnestly he told it; how long he had loved her, of the picture withheld, the jealousy he felt each time the doctor named her, the selfish joy he experienced when he heard the doctor was refused; told of his growing dissatisfaction with his engagement, his frequent resolves to break it, his final decision, which that scene in the graveyard had reversed, and then asked if she would not be his—not doubtfully, but confidently, eagerly, as if sure of her answer.

Alas for Guy! he could not believe he heard aright when, turning her head away for a moment while she prayed for strength, Maddy's answer came, "I cannot, Guy, I cannot. I acknowledge the love which has stolen upon me, I know not how, but I cannot do this wrong to Lucy. Away from me you will love her again. You must. Read this, Guy, then say if you can desert her."

She placed Lucy's letter in his hand, and Guy read it with a heart which ached to its very core. It was cruel to deceive that gentle, trusting girl writing so lovingly of him, but to lose Maddy was to his undisciplined nature more dreadful still, and casting the letter aside he pleaded again, this time with the energy of despair, for he read his fate in Maddy's face, and when her lips a second time confirmed her first reply, while she appealed to his sense of honor, of justice, of right, and told him he could and must forget her, he knew there was no hope, and man though he was, bowed his head upon Maddy's hands and wept stormily, mighty, choking sobs, which shook his frame, and seemed to break up the very foundations of his life. Then to Maddy there came a terrible temptation. Was it right for two who loved as they did to live their lives apart?—right in her to force on Guy the fulfillment of vows he could not literally keep? As mental struggles are always the more severe, so Maddy's took all her strength away, and for many minutes she lay so white and still that Guy roused himself to care for her, thinking of nothing except to make her better.

It was a long time ere that interview ended, but when it did there was on Maddy's face a peaceful expression which only the sense of having done right at the cost of a fearful sacrifice could give, while Guy's bore traces of a great and crushing sorrow as he went out from Maddy's presence and felt that to him she was lost forever. He had promised her he would do right, had said he would marry Lucy, being to her what husband should be, had listened with she talked of another world where they neither marry nor are given in marriage, and where it would not be sinful for them to love each other, and as she talked her face had shone like the face of an angel. He had held one of her hands at parting, bending low his head, while she laid the other on it as she blessed him, letting her snowy fingers thread his soft brown hair and linger caressingly among his curly locks. But that was over now. They had parted forever. She was lying where he left her, cold and white, and faint with dizzy pain. He was riding swiftly toward Aikenside, his heart beats keeping time to the swift tread of his horse's feet, and his mind a confused medley of distracted thoughts, amid which two facts stood out prominent and clear—he had lost Maddy Clyde, and had promised her to marry Lucy Atherstone.

For many days after that Guy kept his room, saying he was sick, and refusing to see anyone save Jessie and Mrs. Noah, the latter of whom guessed in part what had happened, and imputing to him far more credit than he deserved, petted and pitied and cared for him until he grew weary of it, and said to her savagely: "You needn't think me so good; for I am not. I wanted Maddy Clyde, and told her so, but she refused me and made me promise to marry Lucy; so I'm going to do that very thing—going to England in a few weeks, or as soon as Maddy is better, and before the sun of this year sets I shall be a married man."

After this all Mrs. Noah's sympathy was in favor of Maddy, the good lady making more than one pilgrimage to Honedale, where she expended all her arguments trying to make Maddy revoke her decision; but Maddy was firm in what she deemed right, and as her health began slowly to improve, and there was no longer an excuse for Guy to tarry, he gave out in the neighborhood that he was at last to be married, and started for England the latter part of October, as unhappy and unwilling a bridegroom, it may be, as ever went after a bride.

Price—Hudgin.

A very pretty wedding took place at noon on Saturday, Aug. 11th, 1928, at the home of Mr. John C. Hudgin, Selby, when his daughter, Beulah M., became the wife of Mr. Clarence Price, B.A., son of Mrs. Lillie Price, Wesley. The Rev. T. H. P. Anderson, in the absence of the pastor, receiving the marriage vows. Shortly at 12 o'clock noon, while Mr. Percival Price, Dominion carrillonneur, played the wedding march, Mr. Hudgin led his daughter to the altar, which was beautifully decorated with ferns and gladioli. The bride was very pretty in pink georgette, trimmed with lace and satin flowers and carrying ophelia roses and maiden hair fern. After congratulations and the signing of the register, the wedding party repaired to the dining room, where a delicious luncheon was served. After a merry hour spent with their young friends the happy couple left by motor to spend their honeymoon at the summer home on the Rideau, of Mr. Jas. Patterson, uncle of the bride. The bride travelled in a beautiful dress of velvet and crepe, with robin's egg blue coat and hat of rose and blue. On their return they will reside in Kitchener, where Mr. Price is science master in the Collegiate. The guests from a distance were Miss A. M. Hunt, Athens; Miss Pearl Price, R.N., from Wellesley Hospital, Toronto; Dr. and Mrs. Ronald Hudgin and Master John, of Kingsville; Mr. Percival Price, Ottawa, Mr. and Mrs. Ross Winter, Millbrook, Crescent, Toronto. The bride, an accomplished and popular young lady, will be greatly missed from the community, where she was the president of the "Y" and for some time organist in the church, also teacher in the section. Amey, of Yarker, when their elder daughter, Helen Margurite, was united in marriage to John Hubert Wilson, son of Mr. and Mrs. R. J. Wilson, of Enterprise, in the presence of their immediate relatives. The ceremony, which was performed by the Rev. E. Farnsworth, took place under an arch of evergreens, ferns and flowers, the house being beautifully decorated with flowers for the occasion. The bride, who was given away by her father, looked charming in a period gown of ivory taffeta and georgette, her veil of embroidered tulle held in place by a bandeau of orange blossoms. She carried a lovely bouquet of pink roses, fern and baby's breath and was unattended. After receiving the congratulations of their friends a delicious lunch was served by six girl friends of the bride, after which the bride cut the wedding cake and presented the waitresses with fancy boxes of it. The happy couple left amid showers of confetti and good wishes, for a motor trip around the Great Lakes, the bride travelling in a very pretty suit of rose georgette, the coat embroidered in rose, blue and mauve, with hat of rose and silver and hose to match. "Now is my (Jesus') soul troubled: and what shall I say? Father save me from this hour: but for this cause came I unto this hour. Father glorify thy name. Then came there a voice from heaven, saying, I have both glorified it, and will glorify it again. The people therefore that stood by and heard it, said that it thundered: others said an angel spoke to him. Jesus answered and said, This voice came not because of me, but for your sakes. Now is the judgment of this world: Now shall the prince of this world be cast out. And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me. This He said signifying what death He should die." John 12:27-33.

WIRELESS BEACONS.

Radio Beacon In Lighthouses Are a Success.

That wireless beacons will entirely displace the ordinary lighthouses is not likely in the near future, but the success which has attended the one already in commission on Rouhd Island and the experimental stations at other places have proved what a valuable supplement they are, says the Christian Science Monitor. Stations in the Oil Country are in course of construction at The Casquets, Harr Point, the Skerries, and Lundy Island, while others have been sanctioned and should be erected within a year at the Isle Skerry and South Rugbop. The average cost of each of these stations is about £4,000.

High expectations have been formed of the rotating beacon transmitter which, if fully realized, may lead to their use entirely by lightkeepers. This system makes use of a vertical closed loop rotating at a uniform speed of one revolution per minute. The radiation from the loop is a maximum in the plane of the loop and zero at right angles to that plane. A special signal, which may be termed the north signal, is sent when the plane of the loop is perpendicular to the geographical meridian, and another, the east signal, when the plane is in the meridian; at other times a steady "dash" is transmitted.

At the ship's receiving station the time of the sending of the north signal is observed and a stop watch is reached a simple calculation gives the observer's bearing from the beacon. As the rotation of the loop is at the rate of once per minute, the number of seconds from the reception of the north signal to the zero multiplied by six gives the bearing in degrees, and calculation can be avoided altogether if the stop-watch dial is graduated in degrees.

WITH the superb ease of a thoroughbred that takes all in its stride, the "Bigger and Better" Chevrolet never falters in the most trying circumstances—proves its mettle on the steepest grades and in the face of the greatest obstacles.

The ruggedness of Chevrolet construction alone makes these things possible. There is no part of the engine—of the chassis—of the body that was not designed primarily for rugged endurance—put to the test again and again on the General Motors Proving Ground.

As a result the "Bigger and Better" Chevrolet sturdily climbs without a halt, the steep slopes of the Rockies, and ploughs its way through the deep mud and gumbo of half-made prairie trails. In whatever conditions it may be placed, the splendid ruggedness of Chevrolet remains loyal in the service of its owner.

Its long life has become proverbial—the very name Chevrolet is a synonym for strength that endures.

The "Bigger and Better" Chevrolet—beautiful in form—luxurious in appointments—supremely rugged in construction—powered by the famous Valve-in-head engine—offers quietly, enduring, trustworthy performance even under adverse conditions.

No matter what the roads—no matter what the weather—at all times the "Bigger and Better" Chevrolet stays on the JOB.

The G.M.A.C. . . . General Motors' own deferred payment plan affords the most convenient and economical way of buying your Chevrolet on time.

PRODUCT OF GENERAL MOTORS OF CANADA, LIMITED

"Stands Scotland where it did?" Yes, except during the period from August 31 to September 3, when it will seem to have been transplanted overnight to a new Highland haunt in the Canadian Rockies. The occasion is the Highland Gathering and Scottish Music Festival, to take place a second time at Banff, Alberta, with headquarters at the Banff Springs Hotel. Songs that the Scot has sung for seven centuries, and martial eggpipes he has played even longer, will again resound in the Canadian Rockies, making Banff resemble its namesake in Auld Scotia.

Initiated last year under the patronage of the Prince of Wales, this festival has quickly established itself as a Canadian institution, with regimental piping contests, athletic games, folksongs and Highland dances —all as old as Scotland herself. Notable among the spiritual features arranged by Harold Eustace Key, musical director of the Canadian Pacific Railway, is the special performance of "The Jolly Beggars," a cantata with text by Burns and music by Sir Henry Bishop. At the daily concerts in the hotel ballroom notable Canadian artists will sing the folksongs of Scotland, and Scottish Canadian leaders will join their laddies in the Highland fling, the sword dance, the sailor's hornpipe, the Scotch reel and the graceful seann triubhas.

The programs of Scottish music are drawn up in historical sequence, beginning with the old ballads of the 15th, 16th and 15th centuries, followed by groups from the period of Mary Queen of Scots, the Stuarts and the Jacobites, selections from the songs of Burns, Sir Walter Scott, Lady Nairne and Christopher North, as well as the Hebridean music recently made popular by Margaret Kennedy Fraser.

At the same time the Alberta Amateur Championship meet will crown the victors in the flat and hurdle races, weight-throwing, tugs-of-war, high and broad jumping, tossing the caber, shot putting and discus and javelin throwing. The regimental pipers from all over the Dominion will compete for the prime offered by E. W. Beatty.

CANADIAN WOMEN'S WORK

BY LUCINDA.

"Have you noticed how the tourist trade has made the houses along the highway more attractive?" said the man at the wheel as we were motoring through the district lying between Montreal, Ottawa and Toronto. "Why the tourist trade?" we asked. Then he drew our attention to the old houses of stone we had passed on the country road on which we were travelling. "Comfortable home you see ,but how few of them have flowers or shrubs in the garden, and they look so shut up. You would think the people were all away." Not long afterwards we reached the provincial highway and soon he was able to point out the difference. On many houses we saw the "Tourist Lodge" sign inviting the travellers to stop. Flowers bloomed in the garden, the verandah had easy chairs and an invitation to come in and rest, the widows were open, for motorists know better than to stop at the house with closed windows, and some of the gardens had umbrellas in gay colors under which were tables where the visitors could be given tea or cool drinks. Then we noticed that the houses that did not wish for the tourist trade had remembered that Canada was having visitors to they too were looking their best with flowers and neat laws. Perennial phlox, dahlias and gladioli are now at their best and all the bright hues the flowers of late summer make a riot of color in the gardens that is altogether charming.

Knees are out of fashion. Paris realized that some time ago. New York followed suit and at the smart hotels, never a knee is seen. We have never have the long skirts that trailed on the ground, collected dust and germs and hampered our movements, but somehow, few ladies are as pretty and the frock that covers them is doing a kindly deed to its owner. Then the artists tell us the line is wrong and that the break should come definiely below the knee for beauty. But these things would not count unless old Dame Fashion had said the word. But she has this time and very firmly too.

It will not be long before the girls are going back to school or beginning to get ready for their first term at college. Most schools where the girls live in residence say what is needed for the winter outfit, but when a girl is going to college there is more choice. She must have the neat, warm bathrobe, and if possible, a pretty kimona and slippers to match, a sweater or two, because classrooms and boarding houses have not an even temperature. The tweed suit is a great boon, for it looks well and is smart for many occasions. If you live far from town, it is as well for the girl to wait until she gets to college to buy an afternoon or evening frock. A girl with clothes that are made on last year's model feels at a disadvantage, and now so many pretty girlish frocks can be bought ready to wear at prices that are reasonable, that the college girl with sense and good taste can buy what she needs under the direction of the saleswomen, who are generally kinly and anxious to give her what is becoming.

It was good news to hear that the Canadian girls took equal honors with the men of their own country at the Olympic races at Amsterdam, Holland. It was a Canadian girl, now living in Toronto, but before that a resident of Saskatoon, who broke the world's record and won the women's high jump with a leap of five feet, three inches. The Toronto girls won the four hundred metres relay and made a new world record. The girls from the United States came in second.

It isn't cowardly to live up to the motto "Safety First" when you are travelling by motor, train, or boat. So often it is the beginners who thinks to impress the party with his ease who gets into trouble. More experienced drivers know better. "I can drive to the station in three minutes, Mr. ——," said a young lad just given a license. "So can any other fool," said the older man, who had driven cars for years.

The Ontario Department of Agriculture is doing a great work with the school gardens. One day "Lucinda" was taken for a drive by a Representative who was going to visit a few of the fifty gardens being cared for and cultivated by the older girls and boys who have passed the Entrance examinations to the High School. The seeds and roots for these gardens are given out upon application to the Representative at a nominal cost and prizes are offered for the best garden. Then the gardens of the children in the schools are also visited. For these the seeds are given to each school and the result of the summer's work is shown in the school fair early in September. In some counties the winners at the school fair exhibit at a school fair later and the county fair. It was most interesting to see the gardens and to realize that the boys and girls are learning that the growing of vegetables and flowers is quite worth while and that good seed, sown in fertilized soil and kept free from weeds, will give good results. An intelligent interest in the farm problems is the greatest factor in keeping the boys and girls on the farm.

Have you ever prepared rhubarb and blueberries together? A good housekeeper told me she had done up some jars of the mixture which was much liked by her family. She cut up the smaller stalks of rhubarb and let the sugar draw off the juice by letting it stand for an hour. Then she added a small quantity of water and stewed the rhubarb as for the table. The blueberries were added in about the same quantity as the rhubarb and boiled for a short time. She says she combines gooseberries and blueberries also.

If you have a garden with herbs, onions and parsley, you, with a few eggs and some cream or milk, can make an omlet for the tourist party that has arrived unexpectedly. Beat six eggs, yolks and whites separately, add 4 eablespoons of milk or cream, salt and pepper to taste. Add herbs and onions. Put into a frying pan in which a tablespoon of butter has been melted. Stir lightly until browning, then fold and serve hot.

INTERCHANGEABLE HEADS.

Notables Could Be Honored With the Same Monument.

Statues with interchangeable heads, so a long series of notables could be honored with the same monument, date back before the Christian era, says French archaeologists.

The recent proposal in Warsaw that such an arrangement would be economical recalled to the French that their research workers in Greece discovered that such a system was used more than 2,000 years ago.

As the name of the temporarily famous person could be inscribed just under the head, it was possible to make a new head in the likeness of the new notable and put it on the old marble base, for as long as the notable needed to be honored.

Inquiring minds have learned that a large percentage of the statues in Paris are of persons long forgotten and whose title to fame seems to them, to-day, rather flimsy. "Why," they ask, "wouldn't it be a good idea to revive the interchangeable monument and let time determine if the notable's fame will justify permanent tribute?"

HEALTH SERVICE OF THE CANADIAN MEDICAL ASSOCIATION

CANCER

With the knowledge that we now possess, the cure of cancer is only possible when the disease is recognized early and proper treatment started at once.

One of the reasons for advising that every person should go to his family physician once a year for a Health Examination is to provide for the discovery of disease in its early stage, and so permit of treatment at a time when it offers the best chance of cure. Otherwise, it is left to the untrained lay person to decide for himself that he is in need of medical care.

For the particular benefit of this latter group, it is necessary to point out the conditions which, if they occur, should be considered as danger signals, and should turn these persons in the direction of their family physician without delay. Everyone who experiences one of the danger signals is not developing cancer, but it requires medical skill to decide whether or not the symptoms which are present, mean cancer.

In its early stages, cancer is a local condition, and, if it is completely removed, there will be no recurrence. If it is not removed, it spreads to other parts of the body and may cause cancer in these other parts. This is the simple explanation of the need for proper early treatment.

Any lump, particularly in the female breast, any abnormal discharge, any sore that does not readily heal, any wart or mole that changes in size or appearance are danger signals.

Pain may not occur in the early stages. The person who thinks that the condition cannot be serious because there is no pain, is mistaken, and, as a result, he may allow the time for cure to slip past.

Medical and surgical knowledge, experience and skill are at the service of the public, but they must wait until the public decide to call upon them.

Questions concerning Health, addressed to the Canadian Medical Association, 184 College Street, Toronto, will be answered by letter. Questions as to diagnosis and treatment will not be answered.

through these bright, autumnal days, when the gorgeous beauty of decaying nature seemed so cruelly to mock her anguish. As long as Guy was there, breathing the same air with herself, she kept up vaguely conscious of a shadowy hope that something would happen without her instrumentality, something to ease the weight pressing so hard upon her, but when she heard that he had really gone, that a line had been received from his after he was on board the steamer, all hope died out of her heart.

At last there came to her three letters, one from Lucy, one from the doctor, and one from Guy himself. Lucy's she opened first, reading of her darling girl's great happiness in seeing her darling boy again, of her sorrow to find him so thin and pale, and strengthened in all save his extreme kindness to her, his careful study of her wants, and evident anxiety to please her in every respect. On this Lucy dwelt until Maddy's heart seemed to leap up and almost turn over in its casing, so fiercely it throbbed and ached with anguish.

The doctor's next was opened, and Maddy read with blinding tears which for a moment's space obscured her pain and sent to her bleeding heart an added pang of disappointment, or was a sense of wrong done to her, she could not tell which. Dr. Holbrook was to be married the same day with Lucy and to Lucy's sister, Mary Ann.

"Maggie, I call her," he wrote, "because that name is so much like my first love, Maddy, who thought I was too old to be her husband, and so made me very wretched for a time, until I met and knew Margaret Atherstone. I have told her of you, Maddy, as I would not marry her without, and she seems willing to take me as I am. We shall come home with Lucy, who is the mere wreck of what he was when I last saw him. He has told me, Maddy, all about it, and though I doubly respect you now, I cannot say that I think you did quite right. Better that one should suffer than two, and Lucy's is a nature which will forget far sooner than yours or Guy's. I pity you all."

This almost killed Maddy; she did not love the doctor, but the knowledge that he was to marry another added to her misery, while what he said of her decision was the crowning blow. Had her sacrifice been for nothing? Would it have been better if she had not sent Guy away? It was anguish unspeakable to believe so, and the shadowy woods never echoed to so bitter a cry of pain as that with which Maddy laid her face on the ground and for a brief moment wished that she might die. God pitied His child then, and for the next half-hour she hardly knew what she suffered.

There was Guy's letter yet to read, and with a listless indifference she opened it, starting as there dropped into her lap a small carte de visite, a perfect likeness of Guy, who sent it, he said, because he wished her to have as much of himself as possible. It would make him happier to know she could sometimes look at him, just as he should look upon her during the winter it was a sin to love the original. And this was all the direct reference he made to the past, except where he spoke of Lucy, telling her how good she was, and how if anything could reconcile him to his fate, it was the knowing how pure and noble a nature Lucy was and how he was getting. Then he wrote of the doctor and Margaret, whom he described as a dashing, brilliant girl, the veriest little coquette in the world, and the exact opposite of Maddy.

This letter, so calm, so cheerful in its tone, had a quieting effect on Maddy, who read it twice, and then placing it in her bosom, started for the cottage, meeting on the way with Flora, who was seeking for her in great alarm. Uncle Joseph had had a fit she said, and had fallen upon the floor, cutting his forehead badly against the sharp point of the stove. Hurryin on, Maddy found that when [illegible] for the physician who [illegible] but shook his head [illegible] he examined his patient. There were all the symptoms of a fever, he said, bidding Maddy prepare for the worst. Nothing in the form of medicine could be positively affect Maddy now, and perhaps it was wisest ordered that Uncle Joseph's illness should take her thoughts from herself. From the very first he refused to take his medicines from anyone save her or Jessie, who, with her mother's permission, stayed altogether at the cottage, and who, as Guy's sister, was a great comfort to Maddy.

As the fever increased, and Uncle Joseph grew more and more delirious, his cries for Sarah were heart-rending, making Jessie weep bitterly as she said to Maddy:

"I knew where this Sarah was I'd go miles on foot to find her and bring her to him."

Something like this Jessie said to her mother when she went for a day to Aikenside, asking if they knew since when she thought Sarah would go.

"Perhaps," and Dora started, absentedly, her long, flowing hair, winding it around her shapely fingers and then letting the soft curls fall across her snowy arms.

"Where do you suppose she is?" was Jessie's next question; but if Agnes knew she did not answer, except by reminding her little daughter that it was past her bedtime.

The next morning Agnes' eyes were very red, as if she had been wakeful the entire night, while her face was full warranted the headache she professed to have.

"Jessie," she said, as they sat together at their breakfast, "I am going to Honedale to-day, going to see Maddy, and shall leave you here."

Jessie demurred a little at first, but finally yielded, wondering what had prompted this visit to the cottage. Maddy wondered so, too, as from the window she saw Agnes' carriage and Jessie alighting from the carriage, and was conscious of a thrill of gratification that she should have come to see her. But Agnes' business concerned the sick man, poor Uncle Joseph, who was sleeping when she came, and so did not hear her voice as in the tidy kitchen she talked to Maddy, appearing extremely agitated, and flashing her eyes rapidly from one part of the room to another, resting now upon the tinware hung upon the wall and now upon the gourd swimming in the water pail standing in the old-fashioned sink with the wooden spout, directly over the pile of stones covering the drain. These things were familiar to the proud woman; she had seen them before, and the sight of them now brought to her a most remorseful regret for the past, while her heart ached cruelly as she wished she had never crossed that threshold, or crossing it had never brought ruin to one of its inmates. Agnes was not the same woman whom we first knew. All hope of the higher and long since been given up, and as Jessie grew older the mother nature was stronger within her, subduing her selfishness, and making her far more gentle and considerate for others than she had been before. To Maddy she was exceedingly kind, and proper in manner than now, when they sat together talking in the humble kitchen of the cottage.

"You look tired and sick," she said. "You cares have been too much for one not strong. I will sit by him till he wakes, and you go to bed."

Very gladly Maddy accepted the offered relief, and utterly worn out with her constant vigils, she was soon sleeping soundly in her own room, while Flora, in the little shed, or back room of the house, was busy with her ironing. Then there was none to follow Agnes as she went slowly into the sick-room where Uncle Joseph lay this thin face flushed with fever light and his lips occasionally moving as he muttered in his sleep. There was a strong contrast between that wasted imbecile and that proud, queenly woman, but she could remember a time when in her self-satisfaction he was the embodiment of every manly beauty, and the knowledge that he loved her, his sister's little hired girl, filled her with pride and vanity. A great change had come to them both since those days, and Agnes, shrinking instinctively from scraping as she muttered in his sleep. There the bed, watched the changing light and his lips occasionally moving as he muttered in his sleep.
